Should it develop, as is now charged. that the National Board of Trade has been trapped into adopting and recommending an amendment to the Cullom bill which would probably permit poeling among the railroads, this fact would not necessarily affect the status of the bill now before the Senate.

The Cullom bill has been approved by the National Board of Trade and by many commercial organizations throughout the country because it makes the Interstate Commerce act effective for the purposes for which it was intended. Without the Cullom amendments, these approving bodies agree, the Interstate Commerce act is ineffective. It is not declared of vital necessity that the additional amendments suggested shall be incorporated in the Cullom bill.

They certainly should not be if there is reason to believe that they promise an unfair advantage to the railroads or threaten to defeat the purposes of the Cullon bill as it now stands. LOWER PRICES ABROAD.

If no other method of proving the responsibility of the tariff for some of the most oppressive trusts in the United States were at hand, that responsibility would be abundantly fixed by the established fact that numbers of trust products sell for lower prices in foreign countries than they bring in the country where they are manufactured.
